“ I remember when we were kids Sandy, Wendy and I shared a bedroom together. Sandy would get bored with how the bedroom was set up and would take the afternoon to rearrange the room. She was always trying to give each of us our own space in the room. Just when we started to get used to it. Sandy would decide she was bored and would change the room again. It was amazing how she could always come up with a different combination most of the time. We would come home and hear the furniture moving upstairs and Sandy was at it again.

“ I remember our long walks through our neighborhood. We talked about everything and nothing. We laughed a lot. We walked a couple of miles which usually landed us at Cock Robin for an ice cream treat.

Our final walk through our old neighborhood took place in July of 2012. We spent over an hour catching up in a local coffee Shop.

One final thought, though there are many, happened back in the early 1970's. Sandy and our brother Jim accompanied our grandparents on a road trip to CO to visit Aunt Betty and Uncle Chuck. They drove through a terrible storm which might also have had a tornado. Well after the storm, the sun came out. A beautiful sunny day with a blue sky emerged. Sandy cracked them up with her comment... There's not a SKY in the CLOUDS!

Sandy, you will be missed by all who had the honor of having you in our lives. It was way to short. We will have our many memories to carry us until we meet again.

Your loving Sister, Wendy

“ I remember this one trip when Mom, Jim and me came for a visit after Sandy had moved to North Carolina with her family. We went out for a drive in the mountains and came upon this lookout that required your to have to walk out on this rock ledge. There were no guard rails so if you went close to the edge you could see it had a steep drop off because it was so how high. Sandy was so nervous and it took a lot of coaching to get her to step out on the ledge. She was shaking like crazy and only went about half way. Once we got off ledge she was glad at seeing the amazing view but said she would never do that again. She is going to be missed and I'm so sad her grandkids did not get more time to spend with her.
